The Capital Grille joined the roster of fine restaurants on Larimer Square in 2003. This 7,500 square foot building was the ultimate urban infill project. The building's public face on Larimer Street uses sandstone, steel, and glass in familiar patterns and shapes, but with a modern aesthetic interest and a sense of something new.

Awnings placed between steel channels continue the rhythm of window spacing common on the historic street. A glass curtain-wall tower rises from sandstone piers above an art glass and steel cornice to announce entry. Lights at the base of the structure highlight the steel channels and add another level of interest at night.
